

Satellite radio should continue to be able to provide traffic and weather information and any other "locally oriented" information. I recall that Dish Network was able to provide satellite service to New Yorkers when the Twin Towers were attacked by terrorists. Viacom/CBS had lost their New York feed because the antenna was on top of the towers. I believe I have my information correct. At any rate, from a security stand point one could argue that satellite tv and satellite radio are necessary. The chances of a terrorist attack on the satellites that transmit this information are slim at best. Please reconsider any position that would limit the ability of satellite service.
